Any list of a person's favorites will be inherently both arbitrary and controversial. This list of the ten biographical works that I think are the best will be no exception. For instance, my definition of best will certainly differ from that of others. My best will not be the most scholarly or perhaps even the most important. In my view, the main reason for a biography to be written about a Church leader is that God called them to become something extraordinary. The great question, then, is "why?" A biography that thoroughly explains why a man has been called of God and how He has blessed him in that work is the main reason for a biography. Objectivity, scholarship, use of primary sources, writing style, and the many other tools of the discipline are all important and improve the work, but the relation of those incidents where God has prepared and blessed a man to do His work are the real reasons that a biography becomes special. Although I have read many LDS biographies, I have not read every biography of every Church leader or prominent Latter-day Saint; in fact, as I was preparing this list, I became conscious of how many I haven't read or have only skimmed. So this list is taken only from those biographies I am familiar enough with to make an adequate judgment.

I have not made a distinction between biography and autobiography, although I admittedly much prefer autobiography—a Church leader telling his own story with all the "good stuff" included. To me there is no better book. Here then is my list.
